Internationalisation of the curriculum has asserted its place in higher education. It is now considered a key instrument for all students to acquire international and intercultural competencies. Therefore, internationalisation of teaching and learning has moved into the centre of attention, requiring a range of new skills from lecturers. Most lecturers, however, have hardly been prepared for this. Professional development options are limited and lag behind what is needed. This conference focuses on research based ways to provide lecturers with the necessary skills.

Target audience of the conference are all stakeholders interested in professional development of lecturers, such as researchers, human resources officers, international officers, staff of teaching and learning centres, quality assurance officers and managers and leaders.

During the lunch on 20 September, a networking opportunity will be provided specifically for facilitators and teachers of the Basic Teaching Qualification Programmes (BDB and BKO) to discuss their role in internationalising curricula.

The conference marks the launching of the Centre of Expertise for Global Learning, an initiative of the professorships on the internationalisation of higher education at the Universities of Applied Sciences in The Hague, Rotterdam, Stenden and Zuyd UAS, in collaboration with Hanze UAS and Nuffic. The overall aim of the Centre of Expertise for Global Learning is contributing to global education for all student. The Centre's direct field of attention is equipping lecturers in Dutch universities of applied sciences with the skills to design and facilitate internationalised domestic learning environments, within both Dutch and English taught programmes of study.
